How to Increase
Productivity

While cutting costs at the same time!

VoIP, which stands for Voice over Internet Protocol, is one of the more recent and least expensive ways to offer your company with a strong and effective telephone line. Many businesses in the USA are making the move to VoIP service as the latest way to make phone calls and utilize the telephone features required to run their company efficiently. Those who use Business VoIP enjoy the features and versatility that comes along with the phone service.

If you are a resident of the USA, you may also decide on VoIP over a standard phone line. But when it comes to residential versus business, business VoIP wins, hands down. With a residential plan, users commonly only enjoy standard services, such as Caller ID, while business owners can opt for from dozens of tools and features that they need to ensure their company runs perfectly.

If you have a high-speed Internet connection in your small business, then you are nearly there to hooking up with VoIP. VoIP phone services use the Internet to make calls and to receive them, which can cost a lot less than a regular plan. A PBX phone system will usually be included with VoIP service, as well as a few other call management features of the phone.

With a traditional phone service plan, a PBX system is an add-on. But with a Business VoIP phone service, the PBX system will be included. This allows your company the mobility that many traditional phone companies can't provide. When you start to look for a new phone system, compare these two types of services to see the differences between them.
